For me, life is something joyful even if it comes with sadness and problems sometimes, we still manage to be happy. When I was 5 to 7 years old, I was very happy because all I thought about was playing and making friends with our neighbors. My only “problem” back then was how to escape from my mom and dad when they told me to take a nap. As a child, all I wanted was to play—that was my happiness. I’d feel a bit scared because when my mom found out I didn’t sleep, she’d scold me.When I was a kid, life was so joyful because my only problem was when my parents made me nap. I was happy because they always let me join contests when I was young. They wanted me to experience the things they didn’t get to when they were children. My whole family supported me, especially my grandfather, since I never got to meet my grandmothers.

When I turned 18, I still didn't really understand the words "problems in life" or "challenges," because I was used to always having my family with me. We were always together. The friends I had when I was younger are still my friends now that I'm 18—some drifted away, but I also gained new ones.When I was 16, I had a suitor who was also my close friend and classmate. We became a couple when I was 17, and I didn't hide it from my parents. They knew everything because my mom raised me to be open with them. Of course, they still gave me advice because I was young, but I earned their trust—and now that I'm 20, we're still together, and my parents know about it.It wasn't easy, though. After finishing senior high school, I had to stop studying because of financial problems. My family went through a lot—my mom and dad separated but eventually got back together, and we moved to Cavite. It was hard because it was a new environment, and I wasn't used to it. I stopped studying for two years and even heard people say I'd never go back to school and that I'd just get pregnant early.I returned to our old home on January 31, 2025, and decided to try studying in a free school. I was one of those chosen to study at QCU. I decided to live with my boyfriend because he's the one supporting my studies now, and his family helps with everything I need. I'm not saying people should follow my example, but I've faced many challenges that brought me to this situation—and my family knows all about it.We all have our own struggles in life. I just want to prove to those who said I'd never get anywhere and would always suffer that they're wrong. From my childhood up to now, I can say it's truly wonderful to be a child. Before, we would cry just because we didn't get the toy we wanted—but now, we face problems that can't be solved just by crying. I've realized that I'm the only one who can find ways to solve my own problems. Back then, it was our parents who solved everything for us, but now, it's us who must stand up and fight through whatever challenges we face.
